Lack of Internalization & Conscience Development in Children: Assessment & Treatment

Many children develop symptoms of childhood psychiatric disorders, such as ADHD, ODD, conduct disorder, bipolar disorder and RAD, due to early abuse/neglect and multiple placements/caregivers. Often, the treatment focus follows the medical model with the assumption that behavioral symptoms are the result of underlying psychopathology. As an alternative, practitioners can conduct observations of behavior in a variety of settings to determine the effect of various stimulus conditions and setting events, functional assessments to determine the causes and maintainers of various behavioral symptoms, and careful analysis of learning histories to determine the efficacy of various reinforcers and punishers. School Psychologists are able to provide assessment-driven treatment approaches, to design therapeutic environments that support the learning of appropriate replacement behaviors and to facilitate typical emotional development rather than psychopathology. Although these children function well within these structured settings, once this structure is removed they often fail to maintain or generalize their behavioral changes. Problems arise when these children fail to internalize the values of their parents or the rules of society. Although they know the difference between right and wrong, they fail to act appropriately when the external controls in the environment are removed. Several techniques that can be used to increase maintenance and generalization of treatment gain by focusing on internalization and emotional, moral and conscience development will be presented in this workshop. Case examples will be provided, along with opportunities to get feedback on the cases of participants.
